PREFACE.

Ever since the appearance of the Vocabulary to my German Reader (1870), I have been receiving, from various quarters suggestions and solicitations of a more general German dictionary, to be constructed upon the same plan. It is in response to these suggestions, and at the urgent desire of the publishers, that the compendious German-English dictionary here presented has been prepared. In its preparation I have had the able and efficient assistance of Dr. EDGREN, without which the undertaking would probably never have been executed.

The leading features of the plan have been these.

1. To cast the scheme of meanings of a word into a more systematic form than has been aimed at in other dictionaries, beginning always with the most original and etymological, and drawing out the rest according to their relation to this one.

2. To mark by full-faced type the historical correspondences between English and German words. And this for a double purpose: for the intrinsic linguistic interest of the correspondences, and for facilitating the practical acquisition of the German vocabulary.

Then, as an appendage to this, are pointed out by SMALL CAPITALS those English words which, though coming from other originals, are markedly analogous in formation with the German words which they explain. Thus, for example, SYMPATHY and COMPASSION mean (in Greek and Latin respectively), like their German equivalent Mitleid, a 'suffering along with' another or others. The etymologies, then, of the English words will be found given in the English-German part of the volume.

3. To indicate, very briefly, the etymologies of the German words, and especially what may be called their internal etymologies, the derivations of German words from one another. Of those of them which come from classical originals and have English correspondents, the etymology is given with more fullness in the English-German part.

4. To bring within the compass of a single moderate volume as much as possible of what would be most useful to the student of German. In the departments of technical terms, of obsolescent or unusual and dialectic words, and of compounds, it is wholly impracticable, in however bulky a dictionary, to provide for all the possible needs of all classes of students. This work lays no claim to completeness in any of these departments; it only endeavors to leave out what on the whole will be least missed. In order to attain the desired brevity, there have been omitted, in the first place, great numbers of the compound words which are wont to be given: such, namely, as are most obviously self-explaining to the learner after his first advances in the acquisition of the language. The intention has been, however, to retain the standard or most current compounds, and, everywhere, enough to illustrate the use in composition of all words. All compounds given are put, for ease of alphabetic reference, under their first member, with cross references wherever they seemed called for.

Then, in the second place, derivatives of very widely or almost universally possible formation are but sparingly given as separate articles. So, especially, adverbs having the same form as adjectives are treated by themselves only in exceptional cases. Infinitives used as ordinary nouns, and participles as ordinary adjectives, are noticed only when such use is especially frequent or conspicuous, and then generally under the verb to which the words belong. So in like manner with adjectives used as nouns. Diminutives in chen and lein are usually unnoticed, unless there is something peculiar about their form or meaning. And derivatives in er from verbs, and in heit or feit from adjectives, especially from compound verbs or adjectives, are by no means all introduced.

The extent of the vocabulary actually given is not far from 60,000 words.

The preterit and past participle of all verbs conjugated irregularly are given in their alphabetic place, for the convenience of beginners. A list of such verbs, with all necessary information as to their inflection, is added at the end.

The accent is marked wherever there seemed to be anything gained by it.

The innovations in spelling which are beginning to find authoritative acceptance and currency in Germany will be found generally noticed, alongside the old traditional orthography. It is as yet too early to put the new in place of the old—as it is too early to discard the use of capitals for all nouns, the use of the old monkish characters, and other undesirable inherited peculiarities against which the Germans themselves are beginning a struggle wherein we may heartily wish them success.

The authorities most constantly consulted in the preparation of the dictionary have been Sanders, Weigand, and Lucas.

The English-German Part of the work is of a less independent character, being more immediately based on the works of previous lexicographers.

Its plan is in general accordant with that of the other Part, and only a few of its details call for a word of explanation.

The historical correspondences are marked in the way already explained; those of analogy, for lack of similar means of indicating them, are left unnoticed.

The etymologies are given in a different manner, as required by the nature of the case, and by the intent to make each Part in this respect a kind of complement of the other. To save space, in a group of obviously related words, the etymology of only one is generally given, with references to it where they seemed to be called for. The derivation is often much abbreviated by the leaving out of intermediate steps, explanation of the original etymologic sense of the word being the object most directly aimed at. Thus, for example, under defect, the explanation “Lat. de-fectus (facere, ‘make’)” means that the word represents the Latin word defectus, of which de has its own explanation in its alphabetic place, and fectus comes from the verb facere meaning 'make'—and often the abbreviation is still greater than this.

For brevity's sake, the adverbs in ly formed from adjectives are only in exceptional cases given as separate articles; and of nouns in ness formed from adjectives, and nouns in er formed from verbs, only a part are noticed, including the most usual and important.

The etymologies are principally founded on those of Mahn, in "Webster's" dictionary; but other authorities have been compared, especially Scheler.

A list of irregular verbs is added to this Part, as to the other.

EXPLANATIONS.

The only abbreviations used which are not entirely self-explaining are as follows :

Ang. Anglo-Saxon.

E. English.

f. feminine noun.

fr. from.

Fr. French.

Gr. Greek.

h. has haben as auxiliary.

intr. intransitive verb.

L. Lat. late or low Latin.

m. masculine noun.

n. neuter noun.

N. New (weak) conjugation.

O. Old (strong) conjugation.

O. (H.) G. Old (High) German.

Old Fr. Old French (etc.).

refl. reflexive verb.

j. has sein as auxiliary.

tr. transitive verb.

Nouns are marked as such only by the abbreviation for gender, and verbs by that for transitive, intransitive, or reflexive. To each noun is added the ending of the genitive singular (except in the case of feminines), and that of the nominative plural (if it has a plural in use). But for the declension of compound nouns the simple nouns are to be consulted. The conjugation of the verb is specified only if it is Old (strong); if it takes sein as auxiliary, an j. is added. A list of irregular verbs, with their irregularities in full, will be found at the end.

English words or parts of words which are historically the same or akin with the German words defined by them are printed in full-faced letter; thus, Äsel, eel; ab, off, of; abbieten, overbid. English words, on the other hand, which, coming from other than Germanic sources, are analogous with the German word defined by them, in derivation and application, are printed in small capitals: thus, abhängig, DEPENDENT; Äußerung, EXPRESSION; Mitleid, SYMPATHY, COMPASSION. The etymologies of the words thus marked may be sought in the English-German Part.

In the alphabetic arrangement, the modified vowel (ä, Ä, etc.) is treated as the simple vowel, and ß as a double f (ff).
